

Bright outlook for 2007

20 November 2006

Project Doctor seems set to go places in 2007.

It has been quite a busy year for Project Doctor. Our corporate clients have kept us busy for more than our capacity allowed, but we are thankful that we have been able to provide the typical Project Doctor services our clients have become accustomed to.

The year 2007 promises to be an even more exiting year. We are busy expanding the size of our team as a way of dealing with increasing demand. We are extremely fortunate to be in a position to bring on board top calibre project management professionals, which will put us in good stead to meet our clients' demands.

Also reacting to client needs, we'll be setting up a Project Office capability, affording our clients an opportunity to outsource programme and project management and administration with relative ease. The Project Office will serve clients who do not wish to set up their own project offices. The Project Office will run as if it is an extension of the client's business.

The clients will benefit from this arrangement in that they do not have to invest in infrastructure and resources for their project portfolios. This makes a lot of sense given the nature of the project world. The number and nature of projects in an organisation changes all the time, and so does the available budget. More and more organisations are resisting creating their own infrastructure if it can be sourced from outside the organisation.

Project Doctor adds value to its clients by introducing best-of-breed programme and project management practices into all its projects.
